Choreography

This year the Architecture workshop celebrates the return of the party to our collective space, and takes as its starting point an open analogy. If the building, the city, the territory, and the life that inhabits them are objects in concerted transformation, we might as well say that they dance. Their study can therefore be called choreography.

Two mutually dependent axes feed this study:

a) To be a choreographer means to be concerned with a kind of plural (« choral ») movement. Each built environment allows certain movements, and excludes others. But a built environment is also made of multiple and apprehensible movements.

b) To be a choreographer means to be concerned with a kind of drawing or writing (« graphy »). Every observed, calculated, or envisaged form demands to be represented, or simply presented. Each line drawn, even by the clicks of a mouse, is a gesture that seeks itself.

The week will be an opportunity to observe new or neglected things, and to sharpen new tools for apprehending the familiar.

The pivot of doors will coexist with the wandering of cats, their masters, the jackhammer, the path of the pencil, that of the ink jet, that of the cutter... The week will end with a big party for which a dance floor will have been collectively designed.

Casa Barragan Guest Room

For the Casa Barragan, the architect designed a guest room with a unique window structure. The window is made of a grid of thin, dark frames, creating a series of small, square openings. This design allows for a controlled amount of light and air to enter the room, while also providing a view of the outdoors. The window is set into a thick, light-colored wall, and the room is finished with a simple, clean design.
